

The People Are My God

Decades ago, the great leader Comrade Kim Jong Il met officials on the occasion of the founding anniversary of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and said:

If there is an omnipotent entity in this world, it is the masses, not any god. The revolution and construction are for the good of the masses, and there would be neither a revolution nor a country apart from them.

For him, the people were his Heaven.

Cherishing an ennobling view on the people that nothing is greater and more sacred and beautiful than them, he always found himself on the people-bound train till the last moment of his life in order to provide them with joy and happiness.

Saying that he would share board and bed with the people throughout his life, he found the worth of waging the revolution in the struggle for their good.

He devoted himself for the good of the people, believing in them as in heaven. His life epitomizes his life-long motto of "The people are my God" and his self-sacrificing devotion.
