

High Appreciation

The respected Comrade Kim Jong Un, during his visit to the Pyongyang Condiments Factory one day in June 2013, looked round the nursery in its compound.

Enjoying the cosy, impressive sight of the nursery, he said that it looked wonderful.

One of the officials present there told him that a new species of turf was planted in the section of the yard where children played and artificial turf was covered along the fence where amusement facilities were installed.

Casting another glance at the lawn, Kim Jong Un said that as the grass looked really fine, he could hardly distinguish real grass from artificial turf. Then looking fondly at the children frolicking on the lawn, he talked about what he had felt during his visit to the Kyongsang Kindergarten.

That day, seeing the yard paved with concrete, he was worried that children might get hurt while playing there. He said it would be advisable to cover the yard with rubber mats or plant turf there.

Recalling his visit to the kindergarten, he said it was very good that the Pyongyang Condiments Factory had covered the yard of the nursery with turf as he had advised. And he praised that the nursery was the first place where the relevant policy of the Workers' Party of Korea turned into reality.
